Lamar's Speech.

At the Democratic caucus for nominating the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, a member of Congress from Mississippi, was made Chairman; and, on being conducted to his seat, took occasion to make a carefully considered speech. Coming from a member of his prominence and influence with his party, Mr. Lamar's utterances on that occasion must be taken as indicating the policy that the Democrats in Congress intend to pursue during the immediate future. The speech was well conceived, and bears the impress of much thoughtful new prosperity, so we may begin for our party consideration. And most of all, among its many merits, are conspicuous the kindly temper, the tone of genial friendliness, and the ardent patriotism with which it abounds. It its spirit is well observed and its exhortations duly carried into practice, it will be found a gratifying herald of the "era of good feeling."

After returning the usual thanks for the distinction shown him, Mr. Lamar thus aliudes to the position of the Democratic majority in the present House of Representatives :-

"We here are confronted with a crisis in the history of the Democratic party and of the country, which brings to our party grand opportunities, but is at the same time freighted for us with solemn responsibilities, and if we do not improve these opportunities and rise to the measure of these responsibilities the fruits brought us here to-day will be for us like the fruit which grows upon the accursed sea."

After alluding to the different functions of the other Departments of the Government, and the relations they sustain to the House of Representatives, he thus points out the duties the Democrats in the House have before them in regard to those Departments:-

The people of the country have charged us -have charged the Democratic party in the House of Representatives with the important duty of bringing these co-ordinate branches of the Government to their just responsibility, and thus by an unciring instinct, or by a keen intelligence, they have blended together our duty, our interests, our inclinations."

On the matter of reform in the civil service of the country, the speaker gives unequivocal expression of the sentiment of his party; saying,-

"The people demand at our hands a sweeping and thorough reform, which shall be conducted in a spirit that will secure the appointment to places of trust and responsibility of the honest, the experienced, and the capable."

Concerning the questions of the publi c expenditures of the Government, Mr. Lamar announces the determination of his party in the House to make a searching scrutiny. And that is just what needs to be thoroughly done. For, in the administration of public affairs, it is the love of money that is the root of all evil. On this point, Mr. Lamar says-

"There is also an imperative demand that a vigilant examination be made into the administration of the public revenue of the country both in its collection and disbursement; that all the public accounts shall be scrutinized by us-as it is the solemn privilege and duty of this House to do-and that corruption be ferreted out, and wrong-doers, no matter how high or low, shall be fearlessly arraigned and fully exposed and punished!" On the vexed question of the tariff the speaker makes this exhibit of the Democratic policy:

ment in the country that, under the specious theory of protecting and festering particular industries and interests, a system of miscalled revenue laws has been in operation, detrimental and blasting to all the other great interests of the country, and maintained at the expense of the general revenue, and to the mjury of the great majority of the people, and of those classes—the farmers and laborers who are least able to bear the burden of op-

In relation to the public debt of the country, Mr. Lamar, though coming from a once repudiating State, take high ground against repudiation in any form. Speaking of this, he says-

"Owing to the exigencies of one of those great internecine conflicts incident to the life of almost every country, also to a pernicious system of legislation, our people, our busines investments, our commerce, and all the divereifled interests of the country are suffering from the eylis of an irredeemable currency In meeting and grappling with the difficulties of this vital and perplexing question it will be our duty to take care that nothing is done which would impair the good faith of the country or tarnish the public honor or lower or disturb the credit of our Government, but we are to remove those obstructions which bar and check the prosperity of the American Republic. It is our duty as Democrats, it is our duty and is to be the glory of the Democratic party while it controls this House, to so that the national debt is paid in full, and that the currency of this democratic Republic is made equal with that of any nation on the earth." On the subject of the Constitutional amendments, made since the war, Mr. Lamar's utterances, though sounding well, are a little ambiguous; especially when speaking of restoring "the Constitution to its primitive strength and authority." He nevertheless spreads its provisions quite broadly. Of this he

"The grandest inspiration of the Democratic party is, and its crowning glory will be, to restore the Constitution to its primitive strength and authority and to make it the protoetor of every section and of every State is the Union and of every human being of every race, color, and condition in the land." Speaking of the patriotism of the people of the South, the speaker's uttersuces were eloquent, and were received with a burst of applause. He said-"On the other hand, the people of whom speak, of whom I am one, are here to-day by their chosen representatives, resdy to honor any draft which the American nation may draw upon their patriotism or their faith in the glory and the beneficent destiny of America at we can love and revere, and serve from a patriotism which shall kult all the people

THE DAILY STAR together in a generous and loving brotherhood, and which shall be as broad as the territory

er which the national flag floats." Reserring again, in his conclusion, to the opportunities and responsibilities of the Democratic party in the House, Mr. Lamar made these excellent exhortations to his party friends then before him. Said he:

"Let us seek to renew the prosperity, to adrance the greatness and glory of our country. Let us resolve to win the confidence and the affection of the whole American people for our party, by showing them that all its representatives have statesmanship, patriotism and strength of purpose enough to deserve that confidence and affection.

" * * * A renewed prosperity is everywere urgently desired. Let us, by removing unjus discriminations, by imposing a rigid economy, by restoring a sound currency, by securing the equal rights of all States and all the people, make the Democratic party the authors of s a new and glorious career, in which its history shall be once more, as formerly, the story of the Union's greatest grandeur, and the people's universal happiness and contentment."

Upon the whole, we consider the foregoing a pretty good "confession of taith." Now, the great thing is, to have the members of that political church live fully and faithfully up to their creed.

War Report.

The annual Report of the Secretary of War is before us, and possesses the merit of brevity.

From the Report it appears that our standing army is now twenty-five thousand strong. These are scattered by detachments for guarding the frontiers. The Secretary recommends the enlist ment of music boys over twelve years of age, in order to furnish field music to of the great political revolution which has Companies. At present there is not a single authorized band connected with the Army, except the band at the Military Academy at West Point. All other bands are either voluntary or maintained at the expense of the officers and

There were 2.521 desertions the past year; and the re-enlistments were 1,986. There are 1,300 laundresses employed, who accompany the troops from post to post. Tuese cost the Government about 200,000 annually.

During the year 102 signal stations have been maintained for "weather reports;" and it is worth knowing that, by a minute examination of these re ports, nearly 88 per cent, of these "probabilities" were verified by the event. And of the total number of cautionary signals displayed on lake and sea coast, 76 per cent, bave been afterwards re ported as justified.

One saddening statement made by the Secretary is, that the total number of interments in National cemeteries up to June 30, 1875, was 306,153. The total dow. number of headstones furnished is 63,112, and the work of supply still progressing.

Under the Act of Congress of last February relief had been extended to sufferers from the ravages of grasshoppers to the extent of 1,957,108 rations, which were issued to 63,593 adults and 43,942 children under twelve years of age.

The defensive works of our seaboard consist no longer of solld masonry, but of heavy earth - batteries, thoroughly protected, and arranged for guns and mortars to resist attacks even from the strongest iron-clads. Torpedoes for harbor defense are approved, as a means of preventing hostile vessels from running by our batteries, and for holding them under fire of our artillery.

The expenditure of the War Department for the fiscal year amounted to beauty from my eyes—for then—just $41 277,375, being $1,048,940 less than for the year 1874.

One important matter recommended by the Secretary is a complete survey of the Miscissippi river. The wonder is that it had not been done long ago. We have naval officers enough doing nothing on high pay. Better set them to work.

Starry.

It has always been a favorite theory among renowned men that their destiny was presided over by some special planetary guidance. The Greek Emperor Constantine, Charles the Bold, Charles of Sweden, Napolson the Great, each had his "bright particular star" that led him on to greatness and to glory.

Nor has this stellar influence forsaken the modern men of renown. The Hor. MICHAEL C. KERR, now presiding as Speaker of the National House of Representatives at Washington, has also had his "lucky Star,"-it is known in the Constellation of the Occident as the CIN. CINNATI EVENING STAR. It was under this STAR that Mr. Kerr's name was first of all proposed for the Speakership, to which high office he has now attained. It was on the last day of October, 1874, that this fortunate conjunction occurred; when the EVENING STAR said this-

"Should the next National House of Repr. sentatives be Democratic, Hon. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, will stand a good chance of being Speaker. He is a Western man, has a National reputation, and has not given utterance to any extreme views on the finances that would make him objectionable to the East. There is no public man having a larger ac quaintance than he, nor one who would have o few enemies in his own party."

Henceforth let not the influence of the 'STARS' be disregarded as affecting the career of distinguished men.

A Paris correspondent mentions the following retort which M. Francisque Sarcey, one of the principal theatrical critics, recently made to one of his tormentors, M. Sarcey has rather large ears, and is aware of the fact himself. The other day, an idle fellow, displeased with some of the critic's remarks, alluded to his early a manner intended to be playful. "You are right, sir," said Sarcey, without a moment's he sitation; "my ears are rather too large for a man; but you must also agree that yours are decidedly too small for an ass!"

Monsieur Florian McFlimsey, throw over your purse and I'll go a shopping;" and Jack laughed as he jammed all my poor, rent garments as he jammed all my poor, rent garments back into the my dressing-table drawer.

"It's in my trunk—somewhere," said I vaguely, pommeling the mussy pillows in a weak, fretful way. My head was hot—likewise my temper; besides I was worried about my wardrobe, for I supposed, of course, I'd have to invest my little dwindling pile of fitthy lucre in some new harness since Jack's invoice had made such a pitiful summing up. You see, I was a gay young dog in those balmy days, in the army, of course, as all the other lellows were, since I had the mistortune to be the second son of Lord and tortune to be the second son of Lord and Lady Clanchester, who gave me all they could in bestowing upon me their united blessings and a simple commission. I never got a stiver from home, and my pay went about as fast as I did—which is an expressive fact. I could have flourished notwithstanding all that, if chance and an ugly beast of Jack's hadn't thrown mo outo my last resources and a hot-bed of pain—for, to be brief, I broke my leg.

That happened just three weeks before Jack rummaged over my wearables, and the reason of his search was in compliance with a request of mine to be got out of that tiresome bed and helped into the back room, where I had had a peep of an open window, with a swaying green bough beyond, and a bit of blue omewhere higher. "Oh, never mind," said Jack, at last; "I'll cover your rags with this smoking-jacket smells pretty strong, though, of

"Of course I do—sometimes, that is.

"Of course I do—sometimes, that is. Let me get you over to the window, and if you happen to find—"

Thump! Thump! Thump!

Jack opened the door a trifle, and took in a bit of pasteboard: "Gentlemen's washing and ironing solicited," drawled Jack; "also mending cone without extra charge. Price per dozen, so much, so much'—why, here you are, Clan, and no mistake! Number 190! So-and-so Terrace—just around the corner, boy—shall I builde 'em up and send Leggs?" And, without waiting for any fill mative I might have left like giving him, he tied up the clothes, ran for the nim, he tied up the clothes, ran for the small boy, and, alter giving him sundry instructions, turned his attention to me.

The rooms which I at that particular time inhabited were a pair of second-story back ones, into which I had been husted peli-mell with bloody bones and grimy habitiments, and from which I had never until this day ventured further than the threshold of the new whose four than the threshold of the one whose four walls alone knew the fullest agony I suifered. But to-day Jack, like the sound brick he was, lifted my huge, wasted car-case up, tossed me over, and settled me like a bunch of down in an old sleepyollow of a chair close by the open win

Ah, heaven, the first glimpse I had of the sweet little greenery that spread out its soit lolinge before my weary eyes! I shall never lorget the rows of bright ver-benas that shone bravely along to one side of the clean, narrow gravel path, nor the rich plat of some tropical-leaved thing whose name I never knew; while a tall geranium plant, all ablaze with fresh pink blossom-clusters, is linked with all my life's romance. The sun came in and the air, and the noise of town and traffic were somehow swallowed up in a delicious reverie set to living music. What it was I did not at first realize; but, in the course of time, I grew conscious of m sic as from an instrument, and could readily dis-tinguish the touch of fingers upon a pi-ano. Still it was soft and sweet enough to suothe even my convalencent temper and I should have reveled forever in dreamy state it a shrill voice had not scattered all barmony from my ears and -there entered upon my vision an individual whom I have up to presen writing never yet banished from it.

It was a tail, awkward, strong indi-vidual, with a bright-riboned, high, French cap, and a short, French petti-coat; hair i should call this the raven's wing," only it was glossier and blacker; beauty eyes to match; a yellowisa shriveled skin, and a voice that came dis-tinctly up to my window with its cry

"Mar-guer-eete! M'am'selle Mar-guer-"On, Nance, what news-what news?"

queried an eager, girlish voice, so close under my window that I popped back my head and sat still as a moie.

a little sound of muffled sobbing came up and mixed itself with the rustling up and mixed itself with the rustling seaves at my window-ledge.

"Reech! Ha, ha! Reech? Wif as lette a forsugen as zat is goin' to come?" And I could almost imagine the nearse bantering only cloaked the tears in the bright black eyes that looked tenderly down on the southing Manager.

"Jack!" yelled I. "Jack! I say ____" But my triend was gone—departed—and now could I move? Besides, after letting off my more supreme astonishment in that yell, I was quite content to listen and see ff I could unrayel the profound mystery that seemed to me to lie in the nuterance of my name.

"Un, deux, trois, quatre, cinq, sock wif, ah ciel, more of hole dan sock! Huit, non neu/ wreestband—toujours von lost, ne-lair all de pair! Onze. douze. colluir—pau-vre homme! Un, deux, wescut, sans bou-lons: un. deux.—"

I was on the point of fainting when Jack entered with a match and a cigar—

Jack entered with a match and a cigar—that revived me. I gave a long draw, in which Paradise seemed to enter and held a warning finger up. But the pair were moving away now, I could tell by the lighter patter of receding footsteps. So the warning finger came down and I forgot all about "Mar-guer-ite" in the nectar I inhaled with every breath.

Next morning I begged Jack to toss me over to the window again, and, when I was comfortably ensconced, I began to fret for a sight of the "M'am'selle," whom I had not, as yet, caught a glimpse of. Jack saw my restlessness, and attributed it to another cause. So, thinking he was helping me on, he began:

"Don't you think you'd better let my Lady know of your accident—have her down to see you and cheer you up a patt"

down to see you and cook
bit?"
"N-o!" I snarled.
"Is it exactly kind—your keeping this from her so long? She may hear of it

"I suppose," I growled, interrupting him, sans ceremonic, "I suppose you'd go down and teil her if I said you should!"
"Surely, yes! I'll never get over it, Clan. my taking you out that day—oh yes, I know you'il say 'twas no real fault of mine; but I persuaded you, boy, and somehow it sticks—"
"Jack, don't. Take my blessing, man, and go down and fix it up with my Lady—she'll not care much one way or other;" but a vision of my fond, beautiful, stately mother came before me, and I knew well, when one fleet memory of those love-lit eyes came back to me, why I had kept the matter of my accident os secret. kept the matter of my accident os secret. I was her baby, you must know—a baby, though the sword hung at my side and my epaulets were broad and golden; and I knew that the news would be agony since she was held at home and could in no way seclude herself at that time from the arrategratic world. So I hade Jack the aristocratic world. So I hade Jack go down to Clanchestershire and break the news gently. He left his man with me so that I chould want for nothing. After Jack's departure, I turned to

After Jack's departure, I turned to the window again and grew wrathy at the M'am'selle's delay. But I was delighted, at last, to caten sight of a shimmering cloud of veil stuff advancing from the taller shrubbery, and was thrown into an ecstacy when a girlish figure emerged, the arms laden with a little round basket and a bundle of clothes. She came down the white pebbly streak that parted the rank grass and stonged before the tall geranium. and stopped before the tall geranium. I leaned out, never even noticing that my bandages snapped and my writhed, and, as she felt my eyes her, her face turned slowly toward as a flower to the sun-the sweet, deep gray eyes lifted their cream-white cur-tains and—
"You are ill?" she asked in child-like innocence, raising her voice a little that it might reach me. "I have been," I answered, taken aback at her easy self-assurance and utter lack of conventionalism.

"Your face is very thin and pale, and you look as if you were even now in pain."

"True," said I; "you have drawn my attention to the fact that I have moved my bandages. It does hurt a little, I admit," and I tried to keep the knots of frowns from gathering on my forehead.

"Have you any one there to fix them?"

"Thank you, yes. You must forgive me for looking down to where your blossoms are, Miss Marguerite—"

"Marguerite!"

"I must tell you," said f, smiling in spite of the throbbing wound, "that I overheard you and Nance yesterday."

Such a merry laugh! Up the brightest scale in the world it flew—all sharps and trills and arpeggios! "It's so tunny—so trilis and arpeggios! "It's so tunny-so funny! Why see!" she explained, and funny! Why see!" she explained, and held aloft my poor frayed cuffs and collars—my vests sans boutons. "You see, I take in washing—that is," and her voice grew a triffe graver, "I take it when I can get it. My first fruits came yesterday, and Oh, it he is a gidiculous rag-bag I biess him with all my soul for being first—poor tellow, poor tellow!"

I was a double-hued rainbow, I know I was: for Jack's man, who came in at this was:

was; for Jack's man, who came in at this juncture, looked so frightened that I thought it best to obey him and "'ay a short rest, sur." So I said:

"Miss Marguerite, your pardon! I am called away to have some rest. Adieu!" ealled away to have some rest. Adjour-and I waved my hand.

"Good day!" called she, still laughing; and as I turned from the sill a big clus-ter of the fresh pink geraniums darted into the window and dropped down at

I breathed all my soul away upon those lovely flowers. Not that they were of delicious fragrance, for in point of lact they were of the fishy odor, and hinted of neglected points; but she had touched it—ner fingers had manipulated the stem if not the petals, and I had worn it completely out by the time Jack came home. He came in the best of spirits, which was lucky, since for the next few days i was not allowed to move from my bedor otherwise injure a deuced something or otherwise injure a deduced something about my shin bone.

In the interval my washing came home. Jack held the snowy linen aloft and shook the starchy collars in triumph over my philowed head, while I hugged my little romance tighter than ever, and let him rave. Another bundled up quantity of soited linen and a light summer coat, that had been needing several or coat, that had been needing several of ary nine had multiplied into a long open space under the arm, were dispatched by Leggs. Then I was tossed over to the window,

Then I was tossed over to the window, after a young eternity had set its seal upon my sout, and again I watened for the M'am'selle. When she appeared it was with a big bundle of timp clothes on one beautiful bared-arm and a bag hung by a string on the other. A big, ugly "flat" string on the other. A big, ugly "flat' kept the sun from kissing Ler too boidly and ye writer from leasting his eyes too -well, the adverb used for the sun's caress will answer. She came out to a long white rope that was stretched criss gross over the flower-beds and went up here and there to tall poles only to de-scend again upon the other side. She the house several times for, more. I learned, by attentively watching, the the bag contained forked wooden-pips that held the clothes to their places on the line admirably. At last it came to pass that she advanced to the line in full view of my window. A row of handker-chiefs (pienty of big coroneted letter C's in most ancient Eughsh blushed in bright vermillion from their corners) were caught by the wooden pins before she raised her eyes high enough to meet my own. "Good afternoon," said she, pushing back the hideous sun-hat, "Have you been worse?"

"Not very much worse; only I shal have to be more careful hereafter. How are you pregressing, Miss Marguerite? Any more 'ridiculous rag-bags' on the list?'
